

Delegation is an altitude problem.

Five checks that tell you whether you handed over the work — or just the blame.

Hand over outcomes, not tasks.

A task list makes people wait for the next instruction. An outcome makes them think. Name the destination and the constraints; let the route belong to them.

2

Match the brief to the person.

The same brief is micromanagement to a senior and abandonment to a junior. Calibrate the altitude to the operator, not to your own comfort.

3

Agree the check-in before the work starts.

A check-in agreed up front is support. The same check-in invented mid-flight reads as distrust — and lands as interference.

4

Keep the accountability, give the authority.

If they need your sign-off for every step, you delegated nothing. Authority moves with the work or the work comes back to you at night.

5

Debrief the decision, not the result.

Results have luck in them. Ask how the call was made — that is the part that repeats, and the part you can actually develop.

Delegate the work. Keep the judgment loop.

Follow @Aistmai for one field-tested idea a day.